

References

Boder, David P. (David Pablo). (1949). I did not interview the dead. University of Illinois Press: Urbana.

I found this book by searching Quicklink, Library, entering World War II, selecting Just Books and All fields in LUCAS (Liberty University library catalog) and it retrieved 1377 hits; then narrowed the search using quotation marks around the key phrase, refined the search by selecting Subject and edit Language which provided 16 results. I found the reading of the abstract to be very emotional and befitting a search to try understanding causes of demoralizing the human soul.

De Meritt, Linda C. (1999). Lebkuchenherz and Cultural identity: Elizabeth Reichart's Nachtmar. Modern Austrian Literature, Vol.32 Issue 3, p85-99, 15p. Retrieved from EBSCOhost.

Having accessed Article/Journal/Database in Library, I then moved to Academic Search Complete, used Full Text and Scholarly (Peer Reviewed) Journal and then retrieved the article from EBSCOhost. Being a scholarly article, I chose this document because it seems to depict the childhood history of a postwar Austrian citizen who has struggled to help her country remember the attitudes and reasoning that precluded World War II.

Schmidt, Wlf. (2007). Karl Brandt: the Nazi doctor, medicine, and power in the Third Reich. London; New York: Hambledon Continuum.

I found this book by searching LUCAS (Liberty University library catalog). After entering the key phrase, I had to use quotation limiters and also Refine Search, Subject field. It is a scholarly book with bibliographical references and index.

Strauss, Bob. (Jan/Feb 2009). Mission Impossible. Film Comment. New York, Vol. 45, Iss. 1, pg 22, 4pgs.

I found this popular article by searching ProQuest via Summon, using key phrase World War II then adding quotations around it, further refining the search by selecting world war ii on sidebar, then scanning pages 1, 5, and 6. I chose this document for its media entertainment value.

World War II. Retrieved from <http://www.world-war-2.info> .

I searched Bing.com for “World War II” to find this website. It was located on the first page of the results proclaiming “The top resource for World War 2 information on the Internet.” It’s lists included information on “World War 2 history”, “World War 2 facts”, “World War 2 weapons” etc. This source seemed to be scholarly.